

Believe It And You Will See It

by Kathie Brodie

Every time I think I have gone through the last energy shift, the Universe laughs and gives me the chance to sample something else. After all, when I was still in spirit form I volunteered to have a human experience, and I guess I must have signed up for the whole enchilada.

Without realizing that I was giving myself another opportunity to experience something exciting, the other morning I actually took time to watch a DVD, something I seldom do, but I was up at oh-dark-thirty so I decided to treat myself to some quiet time. The DVD I watched was all about orbs. It was fascinating for me to realize that they are probably around me all the time but for whatever reason I just wasn't ready to see or couldn't see them yet.

Suddenly I thought why don't I try taking some pictures in the dark and see what happens? So I found my camera and stood out on the deck and took probably 20 pictures. Then it occurred to me to take some interior pictures in the lighted house. All I did was set my intention to see orbs and snap some pictures of places around the house, and I ended up taking the last few in the corner that feels best to me.

After the DVD was finished I looked at the digital pictures with great anticipation. The first one: nothing. The second one: nothing. I looked at more and more, and again, nothing. Double dog darn. I really wanted to see orbs.

A friend of mine was working in Eastern Washington in a theatre and she took pictures filled with orbs. She had the bright idea to tell them to line up and the next frame had the orbs in an "H" shape, which is the first letter of her name.

I have to admit I had a moment of what's wrong with me, why can't I see them too? Universe has been shaking up my world more than usual lately and I have changed the way I look at a lot of things. How much more do I need to do?

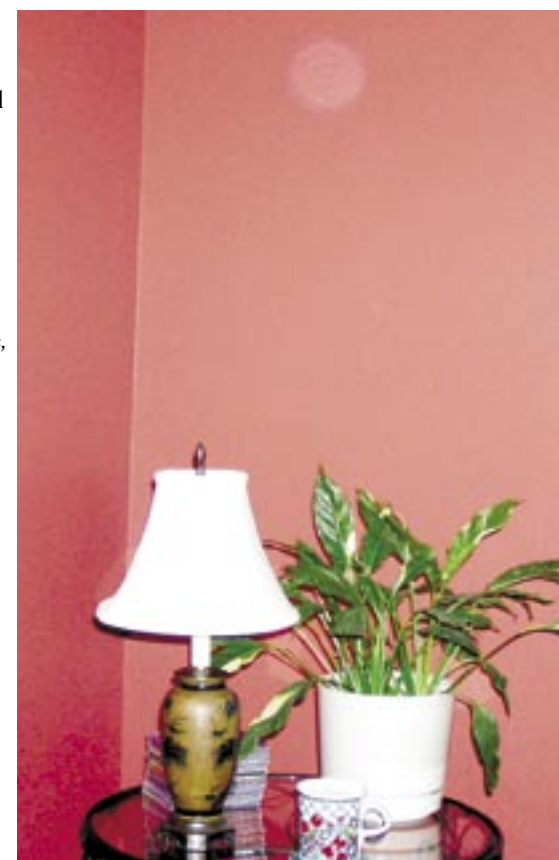

So, I stopped feeling sorry for myself and decided I would continue to trust and have faith that Universe would not abandon me, that I am doing the right thing, and looked at the last few pictures in the group that I had taken inside the house in my favorite corner, and there they were! Orbs! There was a clear round one totally alone up on the wall, and several nestled in the plant on the table. Wow!

I keep asking my guides why things happen or don't happen, and they just laugh at me and tell me to stop asking the "w" word. I understand that the "why" dance is the left brain/right brain dance, but for those of us that were born and raised in corporate America, getting out of the left brain is a struggle, one that I deal with constantly. Lately I have been more right brained, journaling, watching DVDs about energy-related events and just giving myself the time and permission to let my mind think along different paths. All I can figure is that when I actually asked to see the orbs and opened myself up to accepting whether they appeared or not, coupled with the information that they are all around, voila, they appeared.

Has anyone else noticed that so much is changing and at such a fast pace? At this point I guess that is sort of rhetorical. I used to marvel at it while I watched everything. It felt like I was on a train watching the landscape outside the window pass by and the train just kept going faster and faster, that I was almost a bystander. Now I feel like I'm a part of the process and I can step into the landscape and out of it again without leaving the train.

I know it sounds odd, but all it is is a shift in consciousness, a different way of looking at the landscape, of actually being a part of it instead of sitting on the train and being a bystander. I ask for answers, I plead

After trying unsuccessfully to take photos of orbs and almost giving up, Kathie Brodie looked at the last few pictures she had taken of her favorite corner in the house, and realized she had succeeded.

with my guides, I journal, and every once in a while they must get tired of me asking so they give me a little tidbit. This tidbit was "believe
